Maximizing investment in America – 4 things investors must know

After visiting Washington, D.C. for an event earlier this year, Impax Senior Economic Advisor Charlie Donovan returned with 4 key takeaways for investors:

The build-out of the clean energy economy is accelerating

More than 500 new or expanded clean energy manufacturing projects and more than a quarter of a million new clean tech jobs have been created in the US in just the past 2 years.¹

The supply of green electrons is expanding, but not fast enough

Rapid growth in data centers, electric vehicle fleets and industrial electrification makes the opportunity for renewable power project developers even bigger.

The IRA won't be repealed

The US Inflation Reduction Act (IRA) spending may be reduced in some areas, but the disproportionate economic benefit to Republican-leaning states will ensure its survival.

Balancing the books

As the economic cycle matures and a new political cycle approaches, focus now shifts towards competing visions for sustainably reducing the US fiscal deficit.

Anchoring a more inclusive economy: extending access to finance

Digital tools and innovative products are enabling the financial sector to better serve evolving customer demands, especially in emerging markets where vast unmet needs remain.

Innovation and digital technologies are helping to reduce friction and lower costs in the global financial system, plugging more people into the financial infrastructure that could enable them to thrive.

The potential economic benefits of greater financial inclusion are vast. For example, connecting the world's "unbanked" population to banking products could add US$250bn to global gross domestic product (GDP) - about the same as the Portuguese economy.^{2,3} This translates into large opportunities for companies that can offer innovative solutions to financerelated challenges.

Two of these opportunities extending access to banking and enabling people to plan for their financial futures - center on emerging markets, where financial security is generally lower. Another two - making payments more efficient and secure, and improving credit data - are global in nature. Where financial services companies can address evolving needs and enable better outcomes for customers, we believe they can benefit from structural drivers of long-term demand as the world's population becomes richer, older and better connected.

Executive summary:

- Better access to financial products, from basic bank accounts to loans and insurance, can enable people to live in greater security, with more opportunities to participate in economic growth.
- Innovative companies are leveraging digital technologies to overcome geographical barriers to banking in emerging markets, to make payments more secure and to improve access to credit worldwide.
- We believe pioneering companies can address unmet financial needs, seizing the opportunities presented by the transition to a more inclusive global economy.

Reinforcing the transition

Innovative financial services and technologies can continue to broaden financial inclusion, while making global commerce more efficient and more secure. We expect secular trends, namely the digitalization of the global economy and the expanding and ageing Asian middle class, to provide long-term tailwinds for providers of these solutions.

By enabling better financial inclusion, these companies can also unlock and underpin a self-reinforcing cycle of greater opportunity. After all, a more prosperous and digitally connected customer base should support growing demand for financial services. Ultimately, it is our conviction that companies whose services improve access to finance can thrive alongside their customers, catalyzing social mobility and propelling the transition to a more inclusive economy.

The full annual and semi-annual reports, with more detailed information including complete portfolio holdings and financial statements, will continue to be available on Impax's website at impaxam.com/docs. A copy of the full report can be mailed to you upon request.
